School's out!

And some 6,000,000 children are out—out one good meal they got daily while school was in session—the free school lunch.

Books are thrown aside, but these youngsters from families that can't provide them an adequate diet are still learning, the hard way, that hunger takes no vacation.

Thousands of communities have made sure that in their schools hungry kids eat that one good meal a day, 9 months a year. The United States Department of Agriculture, through its Agricultural Marketing Administration, has supplied food free to help make these lunches possible. This food is furnished as part of the USDA program to step up consumption of farm products and to increase market outlets for farmers.

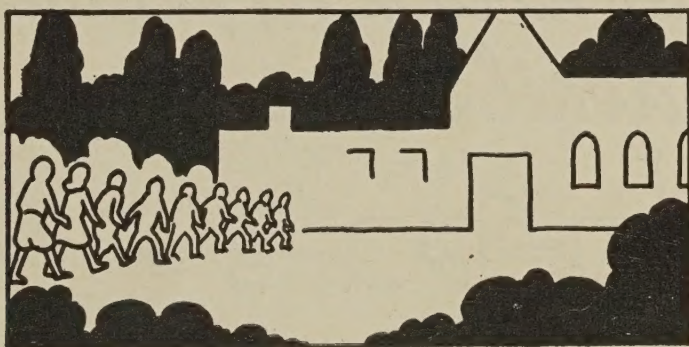

Communities have made a running start by feeding the children during the school year. Now is the time to follow through on the job; to give them lunches in summer. A well-rounded diet 12 months of the year, not merely 9 months, is essential for full health, growth—and for a strong Nation.
